

Kamaloca

The wisdom of love in the mystery of death

"...The living have far greater influence on the dead than the dead has on the self or those who have also died have upon him. And this is tremendously important. It is really only an individual who has remained on the physical plane, who had established some relationship with the dead, who through human will is able to bring about certain changes in the conditions of souls between death and rebirth...."

Dr. Rudolf Steiner

Between Death and Rebirth, lecture III, Dec 03 1912

‘The spiritual intention behind karmaloca is to provide irrefutable proof of the importance of consequence, in particular, the consequence of how we treat each other. Every action, every thought, every intention that we experience with or towards another person, binds us to that person if the other person holds onto it. In karmaloca we must endure the full pain of knowing exactly how much the other person is bound to the consequence of our previous encounters. The pain of this is amplified by the knowledge that once dead, we can no longer take steps to heal or rectify the situation.

And yet, each of us that are alive can still have influence over the way in which we allow consequence to remain bound up between the dead and ourselves. We can choose to hold onto our thoughts and feelings towards the dead, or we can strive to loosen the bonds.

It is by compassionate privilege that the living person has an opportunity to alter the consequence of the encounter. This is when we, the living, can strive to forgive and forget past hurts and injustices. The extent of our success, or not, in this striving, determines the extent to which the consequences continue to be felt in karmaloca. Where there is no forgiveness to mitigate the binding; the binding must continue on, which means both parties will sustain the ill will through as many incarnations as it takes until forgiveness reigns. This cycle will continue until we have the ability to look upon ourselves with unwavering honesty; and to look upon others with unwavering compassion.’

Kelly Connor

To Cause A Death (Clairview Books)

Kamaloca consultations are now available with Kelly Connor in Forest Row, online or by telephone (£40 ph)
www.kellyconnor.com